The OECD Better Life Index and the World Happiness Index are widely recognized tools that provide insights into the well-being of various nations. The OECD Better Life Index evaluates well-being across 11 dimensions, including income, education, and environmental quality, offering a comprehensive look at quality of life. The World Happiness Index, on the other hand, ranks countries based on how happy their citizens report feeling, considering factors such as social support, income, and life expectancy. Though each index focuses on different aspects, there is often a strong correlation between the two. Countries with high scores in the OECD Better Life Index tend to also rank highly in the World Happiness Index, as improved living conditions generally lead..
